The post-9/11 era has been marked by a dramatic increase in the use of military force in the name of counterterrorism. The United States has invaded Afghanistan, Iraq, and Syria, and has conducted drone strikes in Yemen, Pakistan, and Somalia. These interventions have been costly in terms of both human life and financial resources, and have often failed to achieve their objectives.

The traditional approaches of military intervention and state-building have proven to be ineffective in governing security after war. Military interventions often lead to more violence and instability, and state-building projects are often unsustainable in the long term. This is because these approaches fail to address the root causes of conflict, such as poverty, inequality, and political oppression.

More creative and holistic approaches are needed to govern security after war. These approaches must focus on addressing the underlying causes of conflict, building sustainable institutions, and empowering local communities.

One promising approach is the concept of "security governance." Security governance is a multi-disciplinary approach that seeks to understand and improve the way that security is governed. It involves a range of actors, including governments, civil society organizations, and international organizations. Security governance approaches seek to address the root causes of conflict, build sustainable institutions, and empower local communities.

Another promising approach is the concept of "human security." Human security is a broad concept that encompasses a range of issues, including economic security, food security, health security, and environmental security. Human security approaches seek to address the needs of individuals and communities, and to create a more just and equitable world.

The post-9/11 era has been a difficult one for global security. However, it has also provided an opportunity to rethink the way that we govern security. By learning from the lessons of the past, we can develop more effective and sustainable approaches to governing security after war.
