- Iraq's desire to control Kuwait. Iraq had long claimed that Kuwait was historically part of Iraq, and it had repeatedly threatened to invade Kuwait in the years leading up to the war.
- Kuwait's refusal to increase oil production. Kuwait was one of the largest oil producers in the world, and Iraq wanted Kuwait to increase its oil production in order to lower the price of oil. Kuwait refused, and Iraq used this as a pretext for invasion.
- The United States' desire to protect its interests in the Middle East. The United States had a long history of involvement in the Middle East, and it was concerned about the threat that Iraq posed to its interests in the region.

The Persian Gulf War began on August 2, 1990, when Iraq invaded Kuwait. The Iraqi army quickly overwhelmed the Kuwaiti defenses and occupied the country. The United States and its allies responded by launching a military campaign to expel Iraq from Kuwait.

The military campaign began on January 17, 1991, with a massive air campaign against Iraqi targets. The air campaign lasted for six weeks and destroyed much of Iraq's military infrastructure. On February 24, 1991, the ground offensive began. The ground offensive lasted for 100 hours and ended with Iraq's defeat.

The Persian Gulf War ended with Iraq's defeat. The war had a profound impact on the region, and it continues to shape events in the Middle East today.

The war led to the establishment of a no-fly zone over Iraq, which prevented Saddam Hussein from using his air force against his own people. The war also led to the imposition of sanctions on Iraq, which crippled Iraq's economy.

The war also had a significant impact on the United States. The war was the first major military conflict since the end of the Cold War, and it marked a new era of American involvement in the Middle East. The war also led to the development of new military technologies, such as the Patriot missile.
